
Subject: Hey John - edrums

Posted by Don Nafe on Fri, 19 May 2006 12:54:03 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

<http://tinyurl.com/kccbf>

Not a bad deal if they don't get bid on...not quite as flexible as a TD 20
but not too shabby either

Don

Subject: Re: Hey John - edrums

Posted by Jamie K on Fri, 19 May 2006 17:14:37 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Attractive price so far. But play a TD10 before you buy one.

It should be fine for triggering computer-based sample sets. However I wouldn't record with it alone and I don't think I'd be happy gigging with it, the toms especially are not convincingly realistic, to my ear.

Also, this one lacks the expander card which you'd want. It has the old style rubber pads for cymbals if that matters to you. It looks like it has a pedal/trigger unit instead of a bass drum pad - you likely won't get a double bass pedal working with that setup. So there may be additional costs in all of that and it'll still only be a TD10.

Some drummers find the Roland mesh tom and snare pads too bouncy, I like them, myself. But after spending an hour or so trying to get it to sound convincing, and really wanting to like it, I was not impressed with the TD10 module itself. My personal take: I think the TD20 would be above my threshold of adequacy sound-wise, along with the DDrum4 and Yamaha DTXtremeII, but the TD10 was below my threshold when I auditioned it.

Cheers,

-Jamie

<http://www.JamieKrutz.com>

Don Nafe wrote:

> <http://tinyurl.com/kccbf>

>

> Not a bad deal if they don't get bid on...not quite as flexible as a TD 20

> but not too shabby either

>

> Don

>

>