It's true. I'm a Mac dude. Is there a Mac workaround?

Thanks!

HI Gantt,
I think your already pursuing the workaround that will work best.:)

I just got off the phone with Intelligent Devices. Turns out that he's only doing challenge-response codes one day a week, so you might have to be patient. I just sent an email myself and the woman I talked to on the phone promised to pass a message along to him as well...

I really wonder why ID doesn't just make it a free download. I can't imagine the revenue stream from 3.0 upgrades or purchases justifies even the time spent doing the challenge-response thing.

In a perfect world they would GPL it, but I'm guessing that the are IP issues with various other parties that prevent that even if ID wanted to, which obviously they don't. But imagine PARIS being the basis for the first truly great, truly free audio application. Wouldn't that be something?

What a bullshit company.

This might start a thread longer than James telling Don that evolution had been proven but only because of Apple, but I think ID did a pretty decent job considering the number of times things went against them. They were competing with Pro Tools, went through the Ensoniq collapse, reprised shortly thereafter by the Emu collapse, were trying to sell a DSP system just as their target market--high end home studio to very nice professional studio--was discovering how good native apps could be, and finally SSC's health problems. A lot of people would have stopped throwing the dice long before ID did after getting snake eyes that many times in a row.

I _do_ think it's long overdue for them to release the software for free, as there is (amazingly) still a bunch of PARIS users. Every time I drive up to East Coast Morgan is shipping out yet another PARIS gadget. But I don't think that makes them a bullshit company.

They used to be a good company. Now they have NO value for their customers and only want more cash. Servicing challenge / responses once a week is wrong. Charging for a dead product is wrong. Providing no support is wrong.
 Other than that they are a fine company.
