Hey John, I was just pointing out the article and passing the information on. Notice I made no comment, but I will now. I think it's a good sign that Microsoft is acknowledging the situation and that they are planning on doing something about it. I think it's great that MS is going to try to make Windows a better user experience.

Hi Aaron,

I'm curious what difficulties you are having with OWA. Accessing with non IE browsers, etc.

At work, we're IE only. The problems I have are lack of pace with Outlook 2007. Things like color coordinations, being able to see more than one day at a time, the entire look/feel of the left pane not matching outlook, tasks/contacts/calendar/etc... Public folders are screwy in placements. It's not a good user experience, and I can see no reason for it to be that way in the GUI other than shitty coding. It seems like with every release of OWA it's always far behind in features versus Outlook, and that makes no sense.
No right click for menu drop downs. We run a companyweb on MS exchange on a MS 2k3 SBS server using MS-IIS - MS products the whole way.. And it still isn't right? Puh-leeeez. I hear they're looking to try to compete with Google on web based office products. Good luck with that path, MS. Better than the previous version isn't cutting it when the previous version sucks.. day late/dollar short rings a bell here.

You?
