The newsgroup server never told me it had posted the first one, so I wrote a second one. And of course, it posted both...

Pick the one you laugh at hardest, and call it reality...

headedness on the part of other people.

Hearing a perspective for what it actually is and not assuming what it might mean. Sharing views, insight and information as a two way street. Leaving mental ruts behind. Taking away new knowledge. Good stuff when it happens. Takes exceptional concentration, sometimes. Can't say I always succeed.

I'm shooting interviews and concert footage tomorrow. Should be a blast.

Cheers,

And who made you the rater-of-discussions anyway? I do think you took a bit of a cheap shot there considering the effort we made to get along. I guess we are all learning to live with each other's idiotsyncracies. (is that a word?)

So, what are you doing on the shoot? Camera op? production mixer? featured artist? sword swallower? tattoo man?

I'd be more interested in the collective horsepower of the EDS chips = than the track count. I tend to hover around 40-50 ish on most band = productions.. but I never seem to have enough Paris DSP. If someone = could just build a super EDS daughterboard emulator, that'd solve a load = t Isreal is a US client state and, yes, the Arab who are the victims of this policy are upset about it. Unkind to Muslims? This cat's a real wanker. Kabbul was a tourist destination for decades. And for a good reason: it was a thriving, beautiful city with great hospitals, quality education and was a jewel of a city. Then the US via the CIA funded people they knew were Islamic Extremists - Osama Bin Laden - to fight a war with Russia, with the stated goal of wearing them down financially. It worked. This war is one of the prime factors in the collapse of PS, holy cow this Marshall JCM2000 sounds cool cranked up! Unfortunately, you can hear it down at the stop light when I do that... grrrr... Why can't the modelers sound like that?

Yep. I'm aware of that. If I need to I will reinstall at least the simpler of the two boots if I can't get a stable Paris system this week. My first priority was just to boot to something/anything quickly to make sure that all the hardware was plugged in right. In fact I'm also a bit keen to test whether this same install, which was unstable on my last system, can be made to run nicely with the new board. It's kind of part of my fault finding. Of course a re-install may fix it in any case, but I'm just interested to see if the new mobo on it's own will clear it up.

>just messin though, I've done the same thing

Yeh, I know it's dodgy. I just wanted to get it running. Next months pay will probably buy new OS drives for it anyhow.

no doubt man... obviously you know your shiznit... dunno why I even pointed that out congrats on the new puter mang

I literally kicked the shit out of my computer hoping it would break so I could replace it,, but nope... still tickin.

I just had to make a "panic installment" of Paris on my LOGIC AUDIO computer since the motherboard seems to be faulty on my Paris computer. Everything installed as it should and the default ppj opens correctly. The problem is that I can't open a project from there. I loose contact with the program and eventually the computer "blacks out". Do any of you recognize this problem ? P4 2,66 2Gb RAM, Matrox 450(I had the same in my Paris computer and I didn't have any problem), 3 EDS, 2 MEC, M-audio 1010LT,

Thanks in advance !

Peter!ll prolly build myself a 64 bit box as soon as the whole 64 bit thing is sorted out with all of my various DAw components. I'm just looking for 10-15% headroom right now, just iin case I need it. Never hurts to have it handy, though this DAW seems to be quite happy running 4 x 21' CRT's with a pair of them being driven by a Matrox G450 PCI card, a couple of RME HDSP 9652's and 3 x UAD-1's. I'm so happy with the way this has finally come together that I might not screw it up for a while.

;o)

I know how you feel. I've spent the last few months on my half dead 1.2Gig box, and it's been getting so bad I've been loading one boot, then the other, desperately trying to get something stable. During the last project I was doing I couldn't switch between projects in the end because it crashed 2 of 3 times. I had to shut Paris down and load it back up again every time I wanted to switch songs.

Gets mighty frustrating.

ok, so lets stick be the numbers: by the numbers, rabin is by far the best "terror-reducer" there ever was down there. thus, until proven otherwise, i take the freedom to assume his way was the better one. quite easy. i dont see any reason to somehow become a "believer" into other methods. not when theyre so quite obviously not working yet.

that wasnt meant as a cliché, and from my understanding of your language a loooong way from dumb brabbling like "israel is making the cowboy". youre really projecting something here. but if muscle flexing (which at least in my language is just another term for "impress with strenght", which is what it is) sounds like "cowboy" to you, its not what i meant.

>Hi Kim,
Glad to see you got that board. It should work out great for you.
With the Gig of ram I assume that is 2 sticks of 512 right because you want the far better memory performance of dual channel?

You really should do a fresh install. This board is very very very different than your old one. If you have a broadband connection the reinstall of windows should take at most 45min to 1hr. Paris takes about 10 min to install and configure with a 2 card setup. 3 or more can take longer mainly in trying to fiddle around with the right PCI slot combo. As with all motherboards you can not completely control PCI steering. If a PCI slot shares with multiple on board devices which most do most if not all of the on board devices will follow the PCI IRE setting. You will find on the newer mother boards handle IRQ sharing far better than before. This board especially so. PCI slot 2 and 3 are the best ones to start with when adding cards. I wouldnt bother with the SPDIF connector just plug in the USB/Firewire header. On most newer cases you will get an extra PCI slot space above the AGP slot. If not then put the header on the very bottom one sense this is the least likely to be used. I would leave your NIC ports enabled till your all done installing windows and updated everything. The NVidia one would be the best one to leave enabled sense it is integrated into the chipset. I would also use something other than the on board sound if you are using audio software other than Paris. I'd suggest the MAudio AudioPhile 2496 or 192 models or use the M-Audio FW Audiophile. Otherwise RME stuff.

Here is a quick guide to how I would install things on XP in general.

Makes sure there are no PCI cards in the machine when doing a fresh install of windows. Only the AGP video card.

Install windows sp2.

install marvell nic driver only! from driver cd. Don't install the other drivers sense you will be updating them later.

Download newest @BIOS flash utility and newest BIOS for bios for MB and flash BIOS.

http://asia.giga-byte.com/MotherBoard/FileList/Driver/driver_gbttools_gbt_@bios.exe

http://america.giga-byte.com/MotherBoard/FileList/BIOS/bios_k8nsu939_f6.exe

Install ALL windows xp sp2 updates (use custom update not express). Install them all don't ask any questions just install them dammit.

Install Newest N-Vidia motherboard chipsets drivers.

http://www.nvidia.com/object/nforce_udp_winxp_5.10

Install newest video card drivers.

Install Windows SP2 FW800 patch.
<http://support.microsoft.com/kb/885222/en-us>

Install any audio and Midi devices.

Install your main recording software

Install any DSP PCI cards, i.e., UAD, TC POvercore.

-----040703020807050405090502--hey DJ, what is your latency set at during this project?

is that 60-75% vst performance or actual system performance... via windows task manager?

it sounds like your pci bus is working pretty hard... i just have 2 uad's and the rme running on mine right now.

i would say that amount of cpu usage would be right if you buffer/latency was set at 256 or maybe 512 and/or you were using some native plug-ins. but then again i don't know how much of a strain all your pci stuff might be causing the cpu.

i have the xp2800 on an asus a7n8x-e with 2 gig of pc3200.

i am playing tracks from a 7200 8meg cache 80 gig WD drive.... (no sata).

on average... i will have 48 tracks or more playing.... 50-90% uad-1 usage.... a couple convo reverbs... and 12-20 other native plug-ins going. my buffer is set at 1048. that usually takes me to between 50 and 70%.... 75% tops.... monitoring with the vst performance meter in SX.

thought that might help give you some kinda reference.

i am gettin ready to do a mix with a gob of tracks..... like 70 or something ridiculous.... mostly because 16 of the tracks are from the london symphony orchestra! boing! :-) well see how she holds up!

AMD Athlon XPs w 266mhz FSB (not Sempron or AMD64).

Decent ram and a hefty p/s 450watt or higher.

I still want to beef up the processor but will have to wait for now.

i am no computer expert and i may just be plain off.... but for what you are doing.... that cpu usage sounds kinda high to me.... especially if your buffer setting is at 8192!!

you are syncing PARIS and SX together right? i wonder if that puts a noticeable strain on the system.

being that its working like you want... if it were me i wouldn't worrying about trying to get the cpu performance any better. you know how puters are... sometimes you can make things worse by over tweaking.

picking up a 3200 might give you that extra 5-10% you are looking for.... but you won't know till you pop it in. i'd just go make music and plan on going to the athlon 64 at some point in the not to distant future.

that's my $.02.

I think this is very possible, though it wouldn't seem so. when sharing a common clock source, there are some major interactions between the CPU usage meters on both machines.....do something on one machine, watch the CPU meter change on the other.

Thanks for your thoughts.

Neil,
Sounds like you have a good handle on the issues.
I agree with everything you pointed out. I'm am very interested in how Ozone performs for you. Keep

OK, so I've been trying to finish up my 2nd CD, and there are a couple of songs that are in various stages of completion, but in the meanwhile I've been working on some mixes for the ones that are finished - you guys have heard some of this stuff, I posted links to a few tunes awhile back. Anyway I thought I'd try mastering this stuff myself - not because I think I can do a better job of it than a regular mastering engineer, but mainly just because I wanted to see if I could make it turn out the way I wanted it, and also be able to take the time to tweak as much as I liked - so to that end, some of you may recall that I picked up the Izotope Ozone app awhile back. Some observations on trying to master something that one has recorded oneself:

*You've got no objectivity - even if you leave the song alone & don't listen to it for awhile before attempting a mastering session, when you come back to it, you invariably are influenced by what you've already done in the mix. One one hand, this could be a good thing, because you more than anyone else know where you want to go with the song, but it's also a bad thing because in my case, I seem to want to enhance what I've got, rather than making any subtle changes that could present a different, perhaps better, picture.

*Expanded soundstages - There are a number of apps that can/will widen the stereo field... back in the late early 90's I did quite a number of mixes using the Bedini Audio Spatial Environment, and when I planned on using it I ALWAYS mixed with it inserted & "on". This was the only way I could mix & ensure that I knew what I was getting - boy, was it easy to "find the pocket" for just about any element in the mix using that box. Ozone has a stereo spread section, and it's very cool because it's multi-band, but the problem is, Ozone is pretty CPU-intensive, so if you've got a mix going with a good number of tracks & plugins running, you can't mix with Ozone inserted unless your 'puter is a raging fast one. When you use one of these stereo spread EFX in the mastering process, it affects the mix itself; it changes everything... your reverbs sound like you've boosted the level on them, you've got to watch your vocals, because they can drop, anything you have in stereo gets louder (and yes, I'm talking about even using it in very subtle settings!). Part of the objectivity problem is that since you mixed it, you probably perceive these changes as being more obvious than someone who didn't mix it... so is the change good or bad? Does it bother you because it's an obvious change to you, or is it really OK, and actually sounds better that way? It's hard to tell.

You've got no real solid frame of reference - Although I'm using a different set of speakers to try the mastering process than the ones I mixed on (again striving for some objectivity here), it's still in the same room, which means you're still hearing any effect the room may have on your mix in the same manner as when you were mixing it.

Anyway... gotta go for now - maybe I'll post more on this later; I've got some musings about compression too. lol -----=_NextPart_000_0009_01C58C3C.F8D59340--The mixes of mine that I've had success with are projects that I did in the other incarnations of my studio on different monitors and in different rooms. When I'm mastering mixes of projects I'm doing here, it involves little more than matching levels and trimming up the beginnings and ends.....and maybe a touch loud if the client wants it (which is seldom the case with the genre I'm normally involved in here).....so why would I want to come back and change the equalization/balance that I worked so hard to achieve in a mix? Much better to have another set of experienced ears to make these judgment calls. I'm not likely to want to second guess myself on an entire project.

>Hey guys, just getting back into town from another stint with Will Downing. This past weekend we were in California for the Pasadena Jazz festival. It was a really cool hit as well as a great opportunity to spend some time with other colleagues that I've worked with as well as those that I enjoy listening to.

We were brought on by comedian Sinbad...he's still got it! I also saw Jonathan Butler, Brian Culbertson, Richard Elliot, Rick Braun and even Evelyn "Champaign" King.

We followed that up with a night in Las Vegas (116 degrees) at the Las Vegas

Hilton with R&B crooner Kem. Although I'm not a gambler, I walked away with some additional funding from a "one arm bandit", so suffice it to say, I had a great trip.

TyroneBeen there too. I also have Ozone (and others) and agree with your Expanded soundstages findings - it changes every thing somewhat; and yea it really eats CPU. Can you describe the Bedini Audio Spatial box more?
