a Mesa Boogie Tremoverb 2 x 12 combo amp.

What were your thoughts impressions??

A little research shows that this is versatile, well-loved amp (even among owners of a wide range of styles).

p.s. i hope no-one minds such an off topic post.

Oh, yes, the other guitar man in my group had one for a while which was stolen. My impressons though were not all that great, I was very "Hi Fi" and clear and rich, but I'd take a vintage Reverbarocket any day. No I have a Laney VC50 and VC 30 which I like much better. I always felt the mesa lacked identity or soemthing. Also, although it was clean and rich, it always had a tube rattle rasp at the end of notes, we had it worked on, and re tubed, but this did not go away. take all this in stride though, as I am fairly peculiar in my tastes and this may have been a funky unit. I will say it was almost "Generic" in a very slick way.

"Generic" isn't always a bad thing... If you're recording a band that has other instruments (keys, or some acoustic guitars for example), and really features the vocals more than anything, something really good-sounding, yet "generic", can be perfect for what you need, as it won't tend to step on everything else you've got going on.

"generic"?

on the net... i couldn't find anyone who owned one that didn't love it.

but obviously... why own it if you don't like it!!

go here and read this that i posted at the MARSH.

see if my amp might need serviced. i just bought it used for cheap.

Liek I said the shrill tube sound may have been that this one was bad somewhere (not the tubes), but we could never get rid of it, and really came out in the studio.

The build quality over all is solid. It has a depth to it I liked, and yeah I guess for certain things would be way cool, Juat a buit slick for my taste. Thsi thing is sort of a rolls royce.

Oh now you got me wondering,
I bet this thing would be a killer keyboard amp.
