For anyone who has heard about this...

I submit that both Satriani copied the melody for the song note for note from an earlier mid 80s new wave song. Can anyone help me remember what that song is :-)

Interesting, I thought of that earlier today. Not that I've heard the new wave song, but it crossed my mind as a "what if" scenario.

In any event, I can't believe that it would have been intentional on Coldplay's part.

He, he, it's a classical example in "stealing" something without knowing from where. This riff have been used in hundreds of songs the last 50 years without anyone saying a shit; and now it seems that Satriani needs some money on his "selfmade" riff;o)

He, he, there's a lot of difference in naming Satriani or Satriani;o)

I think the 80's New Wave song Chuck may have been thinking about may have been the Pet Shop Boys tune... but that mashup link I posted proves that there are quite a few songs that sound very similar.

It may be. Thanks Neil. Whenever I hear the new Coldplay cd it surprises me just how many of the songs are instantly recognizable and leave me wondering where I heard them before.

Well, Coldplay even admitted that their last hit (I can't remember the name of it, sorry) evolved as a result of them trying to cover Kate Bush's song "Cloudbusting" (or was it "Running Up that Hill"??? Can't recall what they said), and not being able to do it properly, so they just ended up taking the closest version they could get and turning it into a song of their own.

So, maybe they're notorious for this, and THAT's why their new songs sound so familiar... maybe they're all songs you've already heard, just re-worked.

Even the lyrics make me doubletake, but I think that's cause there are a lot of cliches. Take for example:

Those who are dead, are not dead, they are living in my head (- or something close to that...). Where *haven't* I heard something like that before :-)
