Oh hell . . . here we go. I tried to stop myself, but when somebody throws religion out in front of me, it's like throwing a ball of paper in front of my cat . . . I can't NOT chase it. Especially since I just happen to be about 80% through "God Is Not Great" as we speak.

I had no idea there was a brother Hitchens. Interesting that they disagree on "almost everything." I will hereafter refer to them as Chris and Pete.

OK, first of all, I don't agree with everything in Chris's book, and I think sometimes his points are obscured by the cleverness of his prose. (Or maybe I'm just slow.) Nor do I disagree with everything in Pete's article, but he makes some really tired arguments.

Pete is probably not representative of the type of believer Chris would consider dangerous, because Pete is, by his own description, open-minded. He says religious people do not claim to know everything, or take the bible literally. What? Um . . . actually many of them do claim to know everything, at least everything anyone needs to know, and a whole lot of them do take the bible literally. I don't have any problem with believers who admit to some doubt about what they believe. I'm relieved when I meet religious people who are willing to even admit that their beliefs are beliefs. On the other hand:

"The Bible is the word of God."

"How do you know?"

"Says so in the Bible"

"Oh. Well, how do you know it's true"

"The Bible is the word of God."

"Thanks for clearing that up."

"No problem."

I do have a problem when believers insist that only their beliefs are true, and that everyone must live according to those beliefs. This includes preventing schools from teaching things that may contradict their beliefs. "Science is a religion, too." Uh huh. And lions were once vegetarians.

I also have a problem with religious fanatics who long for Armageddon so much they want to help it along so Jesus will come back. And we're all too familiar with the ones to think committing mass murder/suicide will land them in some kind of cross between Heaven and a whore house. (Why 72 virgins? Isn't one enough? OK, maybe two . . .)

Pete objects to the child abuse chapter. The title of the chapter in the book is "Is Religion Child Abuse?" and the answer is, "it can be." Ritual genital mutilation anyone? Enough said. Or how 'bout a Muslim child being indoctrinated with the belief that believers of any other faith are less than human and deserve to die and that the best thing in life to strive for is martyrdom? Yes . . . child abuse. What about being forced to go to catechism on Saturday mornings when all the cartoons were on . . . well, at the time, I felt abused, but I got over it. I do think it's wrong to teach a child your beliefs without also teaching them that there are other beliefs, and non-beliefs. They should be encouraged to learn about other religions, and to explore spirituality for themselves. Want your kid (or anyone else) to believe as you do? Be a shining example of what your beliefs do for you.

But the silliest, tireddest, and most irritating argument in Pete's article . . . well, here's a few examples:

"We are in the process - encouraged by Christopher - of abolishing religion, and so of abolishing conscience, too."

"If you do not worship God, you end up worshipping power . . . "

"But why should atheists care, or use such terms as "good" and "virtue" anyway? "

"But as soon as we have the power to do evil, we generally do."

Yes folks, it's the absurd idea that without belief in God, there is nothing to stop one from evil behaviour. Maybe believers are drawn to religion because they have so little faith in their own goodness. But I, for one of millions, do not believe in God, Heaven, or Hell except as metaphors, and yet here I am . . . no trail of dead bodies, no plundered wealth, no criminal record, and I'm a nurse with a reputation for being exceptionally empathetic and kind. People can be honest and kind just because they respect the rights and feelings of others . . . no deity required. The "Golden Rule" provides its own rewards and punishments.

I'm going out on a limb here, but I'm gonna turn this argument around and say that if someone really needs the threat of Hell, the enticement of Heaven, and a list of God's rules to be a good person, perhaps he or she is not in possession of a conscience.

Anyway, I recommend the book. He's an amusing writer and makes a pretty good case for the argument that religion is purely a human invention.

Damn it, DC, you knew this would get me . . .

exactly! there's no better reason or justification to persecute and hate than ones self proclaimed righteous belief in a supreme being above all others. hey, doesn't that fall in to the deadly sin of pride???

Thanks for the post DC. While I have not read C. Hitchens latest book, I have seen several interviews with him about it. I am a believer, but I'd have to agree with what I gather is the main thrust of the book: that it is not ok for believers to impose their systems on anyone else. Religion can be cool, but religious tyranny is poison. Having said that, I'll grant anyone, that minding the lines between providing information, influence, persuasion and social control can be very difficult.

Cheers man.

Actually, I was not trying to raise any of these issues. I simply thought it was a really cool to see Chris hoisted a bit on the family petard, and I think Pete pointed out some clear contradictions and illogic in Chris' position and took the argument to another level. Good for him.

I am not much like Pete at all, who is probably 1/2 atheist himself, but at least he is not the evangelist the Chris is.

>I had no idea there was a brother Hitchens. Interesting that they disagree >on "almost everything." I will hereafter refer to them as Chris and Pete.

I think it clearly illustrates how belief (for both positions are belief) seems to lie in a deeper and more basic place than the places we ascribe it to. Not that there should not be a rational basis for it, but we seem to confirm our positions with rationality rather than achieve them with it. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned...

>Pete is probably not representative of the type of believer Chris would >consider dangerous, because Pete is, by his own description, open-minded.

>He says religious people do not claim to know everything, or take the bible >literally. What? Um . . . actually many of them do claim to know >everything, at least everything anyone needs to know, and a whole lot of >them do take the bible literally.

Here is what we are told to take literally:

2 Timothy 3:16

All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness

>I don't have any problem with believers >who admit to some doubt about what they believe.

"The only people I have met in this world who never doubt are materialists and atheists. I think they have a sort of ludicrous certainty that there is nothing transcendental to know. But for me,

Malcolm Muggeridge

>I'm relieved when I meet >religious people who are willing to even admit that their beliefs are Met any atheists like that? Me neither.

>"The Bible is the word of God."
>"How do you know?"
>"Says so in the Bible"
>"Oh. Well, how do you know it's true"
>"The Bible is the word of God."
>"Thanks for clearing that up."
>"No problem."

I'm sure there are people like that. I don't know any...

Here's a much better answer to the question posed above, and it is not very scholarly. There are many more that are.

<http://www.leestrobels.com/Bible.htm>

>I do have a problem when believers insist that only their beliefs are true, >and that everyone must live according to those beliefs.

Well personally I much prefer believers who insist that their beliefs are complete nonsense...

hmmm that didn't come out right... Let me try again.

You are leveraging your comment above that it's all beliefs. Once someone agrees to this, they can never again claim any truth. But, if someone is NOT an atheist, then perhaps there actually may be an objective truth to be found. In which case, all the other myths are myths indeed.

See, the problem is assuming atheist neutrality. It doesn't exist. The idea that you get everyone to simply admit that it is all beliefs and we should all ascribe to the higher ideal of peace and brotherhood while we do our little dance or smoke our little peyote, or sing a hymn has resulted not in atheist utopia, but in the end of belief as it ceases to amuse us, (not to mention the outrages committed by the many atheist utopians of the 20th century).

The way to peace is to take righteousness, to take Jesus Christ, seriously. And that means not substituting your words for his. This, of course, applies equally to the Bible Belt as to the Jesus Seminar...

>This includes >preventing schools from teaching things that may contradict their beliefs.

>"Science is a religion, too." Uh huh. And lions were once vegetarians.

This is a misrepresentation of the ID position, and a rather crude one at that. We want evolution taught, and the fact that there is a controversy about the extrapolations of macroevolution and the philosophical underpinnings of Naturalism taught as well. To deny that there is a controversy is bad science.

>I also have a problem with religious fanatics who long for Armageddon so >much they want to help it along so Jesus will come back.

Me too.

>Pete objects to the child abuse chapter. The title of the chapter in the >book is "Is Religion Child Abuse?" and the answer is, "it can be."

And of course, so can atheism. What is true?

>Ritual

How DARE you criticize their CULTURE??? From what exalted height do you get the right to do so? Remember, you have no absolutes so the elimination of clitoridectomy is only accomplished through the use of power to assert Sarah's own feminist, white, privileged little worldview on others. Pete was right wasn't he?

Anyway, I gotta go drop off the teenager at a graduation, so this will have to wait...

I often wonder whether Revelations came about from ergot or fly agaric or some of that Cannabis Indica that is so friggin strong it makes you incredibly paranoid.....too much Peyote could probably do this if someone was hasslin' you while you were peakin'I don't think psilocybe cubensis type 'shrooms could bring about this kind of mindset, but maybe...especially if you were paranoid about big stadiums full of lions, tigers and bears and were walkin down a street lined with people being crucified.....well...at least that was my experience.....

OK, two quick things . . .

One, while some atheists are as closed-minded and unjustifiably certain of their position as the worst of Christian fundies, these are individuals, and not representative of all atheists. Most atheists simply do not see any reason to believe in God, and to attempt to diminish that position by claiming that "lack of belief is itself belief" is just illogical. Some people need reason to believe, and given insufficient reason, will not believe.

Two, every time someone tries to show me why I should believe the Bible is the word of God (including a bunch of those little videos you linked . . . I didn't watch all of them), there seems to be this hint of desperation to save their beliefs from the brutal onslaught of logic and in some cases, history. The problem is, most every argument I hear is basically "the Bible is the Word of God because it says it is." The conclusion is contained in the premise. Where I went to school, that's called circular logic or "begging the question."

Some of the videos focused on the reliability of the authors of the three synoptic gospels, written 50 - 90 years after Jesus' death. I'm sure they were swell guys who felt they had an important story to tell, but I'm just speculating, as is anyone else who claims to know their methods and motivations.

But belief in the good intentions of Matthew, Mark, and Luke is yet another belief layered over the belief in question, i.e., "The Bible Is the Word of God."

I don't really expect or need an answer to this, I just like to question beliefs. I suspect the reason people believe that the Bible is the Word of God is simply that they have chosen to believe that. And that's OK with me. Whatever floats your boat.

I myself believe that human beings were genetically designed by extraterrestrials using modified ape DNA who then turned us loose in the jungle to see what would happen. That's right, we're just ants in some alien kid's terrarium, and if we don't stop stinking up his room with CO₂, he's gonna take us out in the back yard and blast us with a garden hose.

Walk through just about any cow pasture between San Antonio and Houston where you see Braham cattle grazing and the white cattle egret following them around early in the morning after a rainy night and the little gold caps will be poppin up out of every meadow muffin you see. Happens from April through September once the nighttime temperatures are consistently above 60 degrees. Lots of ranchers are mixing fungicides with their cattle feed these days to keep the hippies out of their fields. Hippies still exist down there.....the Rainbow People have some big camps in this area .

Yep, I believe that too. Now that there are two of us we should incorporate and get us a tax shelter. Might as well go where the big boys go - www.startchurch.com

Dear Name,

My heart aches at the thought of the grief you must be feeling at this time. I do not understand, any more than you do, why one so new in life, and one who promised so much joy, has passed on after such a brief visit.

I am sure that from your short time with little Jessica there are many special memories that you will always hold in your heart. Perhaps they are moments you find painful to remember; yet ones you will never want to forget. Though she was with you for only five days I know that the love you hold in your heart for her will last a lifetime.

In times as difficult as these, lofty words and explanations don't seem to mean much. So I do not offer any words except that Janelle and I love you and are praying for you to have the grace and strength to endure the journey ahead of you.

Losing someone is never easy. It can take months and years before we feel capable of living joyfully again. I want you to know that we will be here for you during your good days and your bad. I want you to feel free to call us at any time and to come in. Many in our church share in the sorrow of what has happened. They, too, are available to you with equally open arms and hearts.

Sincerely,

Your name typed

Hey, why not? It's no crazier a basis that the rest of 'em. Might even be true!

Gotta have a name though, and if we're smart, we'll have mandatory donations for pastoral counselling.

But atheism is not lack of belief. Atheism is the claim to be the only objective truth concerning matters of the Deity. As such it is philosophy and belief, not objectivity. It corrupts belief by its pretense to objectivity, and when it misuses science to support its belief, it corrupts and betrays science. It says: "I know you are all deluded" and as such is the single most blatant power grab by a belief system in the history of humanity, while simultaneously denying it is belief. So in the end you have nothing except hatred of the fundies and a sense of superiority. And you all wonder why people doubt your moral foundations?

Both "I am sure that we were created" and "I am sure there is no God" are philosophical and theological positions. One is wrong. Either is supportable by reason. What do you believe? This great brown wave of hatred of God and believers currently breaking over the culture will succeed with many, but will fail wherever the people have a foundation. You and I talked about this before. You admitted to creating your own god-beliefs, and I warned you that you would have no foundation when you needed one. And here you are...

Then you didn't watch many of those little videos. Now, go here, http://www.annerice.com/bs_b_ChristTheLord.htm

Check out, buy, or borrow the book.

Read the afterword to discover why Anne, she of giant mind and many vampires, became a believer and tell me how desperate she sounds... Tell me which of her reasons to believe are delusions and why you are so much more enlightened.

Remember either you or she are foolish...

Unless there is no evidence against it. Indeed, one of the most compelling issues is the fact that these people went to their deaths, having made no money, gained no political power or influence in their lifetimes, and did so willingly, despite the horrible deaths awaiting them, for no earthly gain. Just imagine if it were actually true, and Jesus was who he said he was....

Read Anne.

Then

At the end, you will only be satisfied with truth. I hope you find it.

Atheism corrupts and betrays science.

This is typical of your style of argument. You have turned the truth completely on its head.

It is organized religion that has a thousand year history of corrupting and denying science. Atheism tends to be pro science. You should do a little reading.

Sorry, but you are just plain wrong. If you translate "I don't believe in God," to "I'm sure there's no God," then perhaps that is a reflection of your own doubt about your beliefs. Believers walk a tightrope and every time someone doubts their beliefs, it's like giving their balance pole a smack. Believers tend to crave agreement to validate their beliefs. I'm not claiming to know anything about the origins of the universe, I'm only saying I do not believe what you believe about it. Sorry, it's simply lack of belief, and no matter how much that disturbs your certainty in your beliefs, lack of belief is not a belief. And anyone who doubts my moral foundations simply because I don't believe in their God has reasoning problems. And don't even talk to me about atheists' "superiority." You're saved, and I'm not, right? Who's being superiour?

What the f' are you talking about? Here I am? Where? Listen, I can't believe in things that don't make sense to me. And I don't want anything to do with a bloodthirsty, primitive God whose wrath can be appeased by the sacrifice of sheep, cattle, or sons. Nor do I want anything to do with a religion that believes that we "inherit" our ancestors sins, and that God sacrificed his "son" (Lamb of God) to give us all a fresh start. What, he was appeasing his own wrath? Why is a Supreme Being wrathful, and vengeful, and even jealous? That doesn't sound very supreme. Sorry, "Jesus died for your sins" has no meaning for me. My sins are forgiven because someone else died? How does this make sense?

I've been listening to other peoples' reasons to believe for about 40 years now, without any of them convincing me. What makes you think the Vampire Queen's reasons will make any more sense to me? They're just going to be conclusions based on a premise that I don't accept. If you want to scan the afterword and send it to me, I'll read it, but I wouldn't get your hopes up.

There's no evidence against the idea that humans were genetically engineered by aliens, either. Do you believe that theory? What about past lives? That's a popular belief which there's no evidence against. I think evidence in favor of an idea carries more weight than lack of evidence against. I believe giant invisible grasshoppers live on Venus and control us with their brain waves. Prove that wrong.

Well, no, I'm sorry, but that is not at all true. How do you think I came to reject Christianity? I kind of had to be in it first, right? I know a lot of non-believers, probably more than believers. All but a few were raised Christian, and many, myself included tried other belief systems on for size. There is nothing hypocritical about refusing to accept something as true unless you yourself have experienced it as true, in fact, would that be the opposite of hypocrisy?

I've spent my life questioning my beliefs, and will continue to do so. And just to bare my soul a little among friends, I will tell you that there have been times when I've been so down and desperate that I begged aloud for God or Jesus or someone out there to save me, and nothing. You know why? It only works if you believe, and saying you believe is not believing.

Haven't read Dawkins, but I haven't found Hitchens or Harris to be especially bitter or hateful, merely justifiably critical.

You read "God Is Not Great" or "The End of Faith" then I'll read something you think is convincing.

No, you used the term atheist, not me. You defended atheism as simply being people with doubts. Perhaps you meant agnosticism, but since Hitchens, with whom you agree on most major points, goes beyond even atheism (which most certainly does assert knowledge of no-deity) to anti-theism which not only is certain of it, but is evangelical in its goals and pejorative to its opponents, I think you must deal with the logical results of your position.

>Believers walk a tightrope and every

As do atheists who have their wrenching, wracking doubts that they are too scared to admit. Personally, I crave the exploration of disbelief because I think that intelligent people deserve better.

It doesn't disturb me at all. However, I think you should turn your doubt a little wider...

Hitchens, that's who, and he admits it. It's one of his few payoffs...
When you believe in negation, there is little else left.

Because you can never, ever fix yourself. Sin, evil if you will, kills.

The wages of sin are death. That is what you deserve and what you will have in the natural world. The gift of God is eternal life.

It's really quite simple. Restored relationship, restored character, all made possible by a gift.

>I've been listening to other peoples' reasons to believe for about 40 years

Not much for it either. Certainly no saints going to their deaths for it.

The hypocrisy is in having such a jolly good time blasting the fundies while leaving the atheists so much respect. You assume one belief is true and act upon it. You are a believer.

Yeah, it requires full commitment and humility. I can't tell you how hard that has been for me... There have been times I REALLY do not like God one little bit. Surprised?

But he has never betrayed me and I continue to manage to get back on my knees when I need to...

I have seen and read interviews with both Harris and Dawkins. I think Dennis Prager pretty much took Harris apart. I can find the piece if you are interested. Dawkins has said that "evolution is the study of things that appear to be designed, but are not" and I have never seen a more bald-faced simple assertion of belief in my life.

What do you find compelling about these books?

take care

Hold on, isn't that really what your Discovery Institute is trying to do?

Seeing as their strategy is to "reverse the stifling dominance of the materialist worldview, and to replace it with a science consonant with Christian and theistic convictions."

1.. Disbelief in or denial of the existence of God or gods.

1.. The doctrine that certainty about first principles or absolute truth is unattainable and that only perceptual phenomena are objects of exact knowledge.

2.. The belief that there can be no proof either that God exists or that God does not exist.

American Heritage Dictionary

Sign me up for disbelief, with a side of agnosticism #2.

The more I think about this, the more I regret engaging in this worn out and pointless argument for the umpteen thousandth time.

There are reasons that people are attacking religion, perhaps moreso now than ever before.

One reason, the obvious one, is the bloody and hypocritical history of religion. One may argue that it is unfair to judge religion now by the sins of the past, but the fact is that among some factions of religion, the blood and hypocrisy continue.

Another reason, speaking of hypocrisy, is the disturbing following of people like Falwell (RIP), Robertson, Dobson, etc., who use tiny bits of the Bible to support their regressive political views and ignore the rest. A lot of us are really sick of influential "Christians" who seem so remarkably un-Christ-like.

A lot of people believe, understandably, that perhaps religion does more harm than good. A lot of people worry, understandably, about the possibility of a nuclear "holy war." The recent crop of anti-religious books, and the resurgence of groups like the Freedom From Religion Foundation reflect these concerns.

Another reason people, such as myself, attack religion is being told in some arrogant, unjustifiably certain way that "if you don't believe as I believe, you are doomed." Maybe they say this because they are truly concerned for my immortal soul. Or maybe it's because the mere fact of my disbelieving their cherished means of dealing with suffering and death brings a sense of terror that they might be wrong. Having spent some time as a proselytizing believer, I suspect the latter. Doubt is contagious. Like misery, religion loves company.

One big problem with trying to argue with a believer is that there is no way to explain why I don't believe without insulting the believer. If I say, "I don't believe this because it's illogical," then by default, I'm calling your reasoning ability into doubt. And it's pointless anyway, because I'm not going to believe something that doesn't make sense to me, and you're not going to let go of a firmly fixed belief. It's also a waste of time to argue something that can't be proved or disproved., e.g., the existence of God, with someone who already "knows" the answer.

Also, according to you, if I don't give equal validity to the beliefs of atheists and fundies, I'm a hypocrite. Atheism makes more sense to me than fundamentalism for reasons I could probably fill my own book with. Having a point of view does not make one a hypocrite, as far as I know.

You know, Scientology would probably tell you that you've been around for many, many lifetimes, and that all the loss and death and foul deeds of those lives are what's between you and spiritual freedom. I think they might also tell you that you have a bunch of disembodied beings sharing your body with you because they're too degraded to have one of their own, or some such thing. Scientology's "gift of eternal life" depends upon using their pastoral counselling technology to deal with those past lives and disembodied beings. (Did I get that right, Bill? Close?) They believe this just as fervently as you believe, and attest to the same kind of life-changing rewards as born again Christians do. What if they're right? How do you know they're not? Do you give this belief as much validity as yours? And if not, doesn't that make you a hypocrite by your reasoning?

You asked what I "find compelling about these books." Well, I've only read Harris and Hitchens, and I don't know about "compelling", but I find it encouraging that intelligent, uncompromising, and thorough challenges to religion are enjoying some mass market appeal. Hopefully it will inspire some people to question their beliefs, and maybe it will remind our representatives that the secular portions of their constituencies are just as important as the noisy followers of loons like James Dobson.

Anyway, argue away if you like, I'm done.

Oh yes. Thank you so much for posting this! Doctrine! I love it!

This is the core of it. And further, it equates atheism with naturalism which we have been asserting for years now.

INDEED, the idea that only perceptual phenomena are objects of exact knowledge is doctrine and it is belief.

And that wraps it up. So much for the objectivity of atheism.

It is just another belief.

Agreed, and some of us are even sick of those who couldn't care less about Christ, using him only when it suits their political goals and ignoring him the rest of the time....

Or they reflect the assertion of a truly evil belief system that will cost

Be aware of the lives (and deaths) of atheists however. They do not tend to be happy ones.

Doubt is wonderful. It is the rebar in the house of faith. I cherish it, while remembering its limits and never treating it as proof.

Such is the result of coming to understand that even the denying of absolutes requires them.

Christians are to forgive even those who despise them. At least you understand what is at stake.

>Also, according to you, if I don't give equal validity to the beliefs of

Not at all! What a misrepresentation... I asked you to give equal doubt to both, not validity. Hypocrisy is laughing at Falwell while bowing to Dawkins...

>Atheism makes more sense to me than

See above. BTW, fundamentalism has traditionally been defined as belief in a literal word-by-word inspiration of scripture (the King James of course). It is now being refined to mean anyone who thinks that God is anything but a metaphor. To believe that Jesus was who he said he was is to now be a fundie! Well count me in. My Lord wore a crown of thorns, I can handle a silly epithet. (I still don't believe in verbal inspiration though...)

DC. Before I drop this I would like you to answer two questions for me. I will help me greatly with any future discussions about religion with you.

1. How old is the earth? Approximately.
2. What percentage of people living on the earth could get into Heaven if percent of Christians are eligible? Is anyone else eligible?

1. I think the earth is around four and a half billion years old. I have no direct evidence but I believe the prevailing science.

If I was going to convert to a traditional religion, I would want to pick it based on the quality of its Heaven (and the ease of entry). I think the traditional Christian Heaven is a little too low key for me, but I do like the Catholic concept of last minute repentance / penitence.

Hehe.....I'd probably end up being a Jew. Seriously. It's really wierd.
My first best friend was Jew. My first girlfriend was a Jew. Throughout my lifetime and even now I've got probably as many Jewish friends as I do any others that proscribe to any religion. When I'm in a large group of people and there are conversations of various kinds going on in the area and people end up clustering together in conversation, nine times out of ten, if the conversation turns to anything that would indicate what religion people in the group are professing, I find that I'm hanging out with the Jews. It's wierd. I don't profess to be a member of any religion at all. I have no particular reason that I'm aware of to like or dislike Jews, or for Jews to like me. Maybe what I like about Jews is that they don't hassle me about wanting me to become a Jew and I don't hassle them about wanting to be anything other than a Jew..

Life is strange,

I know this was for DC, but I will give you some answers.

We don't really know how old the earth is. We are not sure how much time seven days and nights of creation actually are. Our days and nights as we know it today are based on the sun and the earths rotation. The time of creation may have been billions of years. Time as we know it today is some what based on Christ birth. B.C., Before Christ, and A.D. Anno Domini. There might be some thing to this.

It is not based on percentages! It says in the bible, that you must be baptized and believe in Jesus Christ. You must accept Christ as your savior. It's not based on good works, although If you believe, you will follow the ten commandments, do good works and spread the gospel of Jesus Christ.

I think that any of you that don't believe, especially if you do not have good knowledge, should get an easy to read version of the bible and read it cover to cover a few times. You would be able to speak to Christianity more effectively, and have first hand knowledge having read the bible. Then you could decide if the number one selling book has anything good in it.

Not everything in the bible is to be taken literally. When it says, if your eyes offend you, pluck them out, it is making a point. It's not to be taken literally. If it were, after five minutes of watching TV we'd all be blind. It's a lack of understanding, that's why you should read the bible for yourselves.

By the way, Christians are not perfect. We sin and do bad things on a regular basis, that's why we needed forgiveness. We're no angels. We're the sinners. The angels are in Heaven.

It appears to be very old. Certainly older than the creationists believe.

All are eligible. Even non-christians.

Everyone responds to, or rejects the Spirit of God in their hearts. If you listen, you will be led to the cross if at all possible, and of course with God all things are possible.

I don't believe anyone goes to hell because a Christian missionary did not get to them.

As for who does go to hell, it is not mine to judge. Man looks on the outward appearance, God looks on the heart.

My man!

Part of the Genographic dna thing showed that not only was Dad African, but Jewish too...

I always wondered why I was the only "white" guy to hang out with black kids, and I have always gotten along well with Jews.

I had 3 Jewish girlfriends and my best friend in HS too.

Hitchens is a washed up, inelegant, drunken neocon. I haven't read his book (and don't plan to), but I'm sure it's a pale shade of the new Richard Dawkins book.

You think Hitchens is a conservative? Wow...I always thought of him as the self proclaimed mouthpiece of the uber libs..."TCB" <nobody@ishere.com> wrote:

He was a long time ago, but somehow I think all the booze got to his head and he realized the right pays better. He's their little apostate hero.

So you're like our very own Sammy Davis, Jr. Come on, give us a chorus of "Candyman."

Oh, come on, . . . neocon? What self-respecting neocon would write a manifesto shredding religion? I have to admit, after "The Trial of Henry Kissinger" his support for the Iraq invasion baffled me, but maybe it's related to his contempt for Islam. I don't know . . . the man is clearly a drinker, could be a little ethanol encephalopathy going on. But "God Is Not Great" is pretty good . . . doesn't sound like a man impaired.

I wonder if I could make a deal to get 1/4 of his talent in exchange for having to wear that glass eye....

hmmm. I'd do it.

I'd ask for more than 1/4 if you're gonna give up an eye for it. :)
