Crappy!

I really am starting to hate dvd/cd anyway as a format.

I'm hoping usb flash drives will keep coming down in price, and maybe non-writable flash drives will eventually replace dvds and cds for movies and audio.

Most of the movies I rent are glitchy. Probably the dvd player, but still..

Cheers,

TC

Wow! That's amazing that Apple would replace the DVD drive for free. The damaged was caused by somebody else's defective product. So if my MacBook was run over by a defective cement truck, would Apple replace it? ;)

And yet they wouldn't replace a faulty hinge on a Tibook. Even with an extended warranty.

So, some good, some not.

My macbook pro battery melted last week. I mean it physically melted..

I phoned up apple and they said that since I didn't have applecare, and as the MBP batteries were not part of the battery recall, it wouldn't be covered.

After a few choice "gentle and persuasive" words on my part to help illustrate my feelings toward that policy, they had a new one at my door in 2 days and took the melted one back.

You've got to admit, Apple went way beyond the call of duty on this one.
That was also my experience when I had the extended warranty on my iBook.

I always try to find out where they live. Sometimes first and last names are listed on the company answering machine directory lists because they are too damn cheap to hire anyone to answer the phone. It's pretty easy to go to the net and get their address and phone. It's amazing the response you get when you say to them, "well, since your company won't fix it for free, can you handle this personally if I just send it to your place at 4524 Maple Drive?"

Sorry, my child.

I tried to personally visit Steve but he's busy doing a OS X vs. Windows demonstration and is surrounded by the impenetrable security of Windows Vista.

Will try again later.
