This isn't about*our government*. this is about our Supreme Court and the liberal agenda which is all about destroying private property rights for the good of the people Lots of liberals are rich fat cats.

personal history.

In 1989 a group of investors formed to purchase the Texas Rangers baseball franchise and wanted to build a new stadium as a central part of their business plan. To accomplish this without spending any money, they offered GW a full partnership for $600,000 (about 5% of its value). In exchange, George was property that the stadium was built on and, help secure taxpayer guaranteed bonds to finance the purchase. The land was foreclosed and the owners were paid a very low price, later judged by a jury to be only 1/6th of its actual value. This is now considered a textbook case of inappropriate use of eminent domain. George sold his stake for $14 million - while Texas governor -- to a Texas millionaire with lots of businesses regulated by his administration. While campaigning for Gov, George said, "I will do everything I can to defend the power of private property and private property rights when I am the governor of this state." The original landowners eventually received some help through the courts, but it was on the back of the local taxpayers who received a property tax increase.

GW is not directly responsible for the rulings of the Supreme Court, but the White House has set standards that seem to emanate throughout our government.

This is indeed a sad day for all defenders of the US Constitution.

>Still, like I said, I wouldn't make anyone move for a shopping mall.

In my city, there have recently been two fairly well-publicized instances of this sort of thing... the seizures weren't for shopping malls or anything like that - one was due to an elementary school that was pretty old, in need of expansion and either renovation or rebuilding (if I remember right, they ended up deciding it's going to be a complete teardown & rebuild), so in that case, four or five people had to give up their homes to allow for the expansion part of it. In the other instance, there's a somewhat run-down area of town that's been earmarked as an "enterprise zone", and I'm not sure how that whole thing works, but as a result of that, the city can get some kind of federal funding to rebuild/renew that area. They want to put a medical school there (there've been talks with Texas Tech - they already have a nursing school here - and our civic leaders have been lobbying at the state level for assistance in funding this for the past couple of years), and that would cause a much larger amount of people to lose their homes & businesses - I can't recall the exact estimates, but I saw a map of the area with the proposed land for the medical school highlighted, and it seemed to be quite a bit of land. Part of the reason that it's going to affect quite a few people is that the houses in that part of town are older & smaller, so you've got more houses crammed into a given city block, small mom & pop storefronts, things like that.

Anyway, regardless of who's driving this recent decision, seizures for "blighted areas" have been around forever - doesn't have to be for public use, as long as it's being done to remove "blight" - the bad thing about that is that those areas are always poorer areas, and even if you someone in those areas gets 10% or 15% higher than market value for their house, where are they going to go? Where is someone going to go who owns a house in a run-down part of town, and they get $100k for it from the city, but the prevailing value for a house in the market a

Hey, this isn't just a hardware problem. I'm beginning to record a set of songs I wrote last year. While they are mostly in a bunch of different styles, I'm wondering if someone hearing them will say-"Hey, these songs sound like the 60's." The question here is "eminent domain". A new freeway is one thing, a waterfront hotel and shopping outlet is another. We're all on the same page, just saying it differently.
