I've got an old Dell laptop here that I used for a few years. It's had a number of things on the HD over time, including some work files with confidential info (noting that could ever be used by anyone really, but needs to be wiped nonetheless. Will formatting do this? I have heard that there are some wipe proggies that will basically render any data unrecoverable short of the stuff that NSA uses.

Thanks,

Deej

Deej, lets put it this way. I have recovered every piece of data off several 80gb drives that were fully formatted, supposedly erased forever. There is a prog or two out there which are DOD approved for wiping a drive. I think I have one here. Lemme see if i can find it.

Thanks Mark,

Appreciated. It's either an effective wipe or selling the unit without a system drive.

There's plenty of programs to do that kind of job. Here's one of them:

Haven't tried any of them. But I think "Eraser" is freeware and "SecureErase" cost you some $. If they do the same job, it must be easy to make a choice. ;oD
I'm travelling to Crete later on today for two weeks, so my head and body are into a form for holidaygear right now;-)

I believe Norton Utilities has one that writes zeros to the entire drive.

Doesn't it have to write an equal amount of "1's", as well - otherwise the drive would be out of phase?

Pull the drive and smash it with a hammer. That way you know for sure what's what. It's what I do in these situations.

I have no idea, I've never used it, but if so, I stand corrected. . .

I was just joking about the drive being "out of phase".
