A friend of mine needs a dirt cheap digital piano. Of course it needs to sound and feel fantastic. ;oP

I'm looking even cheaper than things like Roland RD-150's and stuff. I see Casio make some hammer action stuff now. Yes yes I know, it's a Casio, but surely they must have improved haven't they? ;o)

I'm hoping someone here has come across some magical gem in the more consumer price ranged keyboards which happens to sound great and have some half decent action. Sound is probably more important than action in this case.

Cheers,
Kim.

I just bought one of these for my kid for Christmas.

http://www.musiciansfriend.com/srs7/g=key/search/detail/base\_pid/702217/

94.00 USD. The Piano is quite decent. Forget the action, there is none.

The piano sounds like you paid 800.00.

Turn off the FX.

Thanks I'll try and check one out. Is it velocity sensing at least?

Cheers,
Kim.

Not even a little bit!

<grin>

If you want that, then this is the one:

http://www.musiciansfriend.com/srs7/g=key/search/detail/base\_pid/702218/

Still cheap. Haven't used it myself.

No doubt some of the same sounds I expect.

I need to find a prosumer audio store to go check some of these out...

Bring some cans to listen with. The onboard speakers are about what you'd expect.

good luck

Yeh fair enough.

I've found the Casio CDP-100 which looks like a contender also. More expensive, but it has hammer action and sounds like it might actually be starting to approach decent sounding, though there are few net reviews. On the down side on the best sound it has only 16 note polyphony.

Anyhow, I'll see how I go... the proof is in the playing...

Cheers,
Kim.

Hi Kim,

Has he considered a used keyboard such as an Alesis QuadraSynth?

Probably can pick one up for a few hundred. You can use their PCMCIA cards to add various sounds. Mine sounds pretty decent, although I'm certainly not a keyboard player.

Have a greay day!

Mark
