If you haven't yet smashed the BCF2000 with a hammer feel free to send it to me for, uh, disposal. I think it'll work OK on OSX.

The only real blue book sadly is EBay.
Look at completed items only and you will easily see what some ones willing to pay for something. We started using that as the main way of taking trade-ins when I worked at East Coast. We would only refer to the blue book if the item wasn't on Ebay.

chrisl@adkproaudio.com I know that some music stores have a blue book that has equipment values.

Does anybody know if there is an equipment blue book on the internet? I need to do an accurate equipment appraisal.

Thanks

JamesThank guys! It's going to be tuff to put a value on things like used cables, CPUs and racks.

just a bunch of .gog files, anyone get it to work? Thanx in advance. -PaulWe usually use the following rule of thumb for equipment 5 years old or newer:

Mint, with original packing - 60 to 70% of new Mint, no packing or documentation - 55% of new Good, mild wear and tear, but fully functional - 50% of new Fair - well used but fully functional - 45% of new Poor - Cosmetic damage but functional - 40% of new

Anything worse than that gets "whatever the market will bear". For equipment older than 5 years, you have to take into account "vintage" or "collectable" status as well.

YMMV

David.

But, I'm not sure which is the best approach to learning. I've downloaded some teaching software (www.guitarscalesmethod.com), and I've also gotten some books full of scale patterns. It seems like I'm presented with two different approaches:

1. This guitarscales thingy is teaching 5 "grid" patterns that contain within them all the modes and scales needed. But you don't really learn the scale pattern per se. Essentially, you learn these grids and from there you learn scale patterns, modes etc...

2. The other approach seems to be to learn scale patterns for all the modes, gradually increasing your scale pattern vocabulary, and learn the notes on the entire neck. None of this grid stuff.

Gosh, I'm ashamed of my newbiness, but I want to go about this in the most efficient way I can, and there must be approaches that are more efficient than others. (By the way, I have a good grounding in theory and technique -though I'm mostly a rhythm player.)

Any thoughts would be appreciated.

MRWatch TV and come up with a solo by ear for every ad during the ad breaks.

During the actual show practice picking/fingering coordination technique...

---=_linux42ba4503--I need a fader controller for SX-

Behringer BC2000=$199.00
Mackie Control=$999.00

I figured it might be worth a try. How could something as benign as a little doohickie that moves faders up and down be a problem. Well.....Uli figured out a way.

Maybe I'll look around for a Houston controller on EBay.
I've got my computer up and running again after uninstalling/reinstalling Cubase SX so I'm good there.

The BCF2000 is definitely defective. The driver loading procedure requires the user to plug the unit in, wait for Windows to recognize new hardware, then to double click on a .exe file which loads the driver. This unit is not recognized as new hardware by Windows. I have tried every permutation I know of to get a driver to work. The driver shows up in the device manager, but in the configuration panel for the Mackie control in SX (the device this POS is supposed to emulate), only an input device shows up. According to Behringer tech support, this ain't right at all. It's going back to MF in the AM. I've spent two days of my life dealing with this evil piece of crap.
No more.

I think's it's an XP/driver thing, but perhaps there are some config's that don't get this problem? Anyone?

And/or pick a tune that has a cool solo on it. First learn to sing the solo.

Then go looking for the notes on the neck. Most likely you'll find the patterns

the guy was using. Once you figure that one out pick another. And another.

And another. After a while you'll have a vocabulary of cool licks to use when improvising.

Scales are scales, not music. Using other people's "systems" seems to me a lot like learning Morse code and then being told "OK, now say something".

First you have to have something to say. Learning how to type won't make you an author, but having a story to tell can certainly make you learn to type!

> Any thoughts would be appreciated.
> MR
> My advice, learn how to play vocal lines on guitar. Pay attention to the subtle nuances in the phrasing, it'll give you a good sense of where to vibrato, or slide, and where legato makes more sense than staccato.

Once you can play vocal melodies with ease, just start singing your own melodies, and play them. Eventually, the notes will just appear in your head, and your fingers will know where to go (most of the time).

Knowing the scales patterns isn't a bad thing, but I see them as mostly useful when the melody isn't happening in your head yet, and you want to have a 'safe' set of notes to fall back on. Me, I see improvisation as happening on a number of levels. At the outer level there's a thought process where you might think about what sort of 'feel' you want to use. This influences the tone, and registers that you use. Then at the innermost level there's the scales and licks that you know by heart that you can hit on periodically.
The whole process involves sometimes thinking about every note, then switching to 'autopilot' for a phrase or two, then back to more context sensitive melodies.
Rapid fire sequences are not typically really improvised, it's more like a thought process you think, I'm at this note right now, and want maybe a rapid sequence up to some sustained note, so you blast through a sequence and maybe along the way hear a note that speaks to you, so you hang on to it for a while.

Really the key is to practice, and really listen to what you play. Try singing notes in your head, and matching them on the guitar. You'll get good at it in no time...

Good luck

that matters?

i have extensions cuz the computers are in another room from my control room.

they are probably ok cables... nothing special.

the switcher is a $50 belkin that i got a comp usa.

e graphics were whacked pretty bad. One of the newer laptops would probably work fine for this.

buttons on the unit. Mine required a simple PROM update to shut off ctrl-key activation (which they sent for free), but works great now - quick to switch, and comes with cables.

This isn't the one I have but seems to be the replacement version:
