Nice!

Here is a shot I took last month while hiking up Moose Mountain in Kananaskis country, 45 minutes away from my home

i would friggin love to get a copy of that record!! i don't know who to pay or where to pay it... but gosh! i need that record! :-) last time i looked on the internet i could not find meltdown or i wanna be a clone.

and yes of course the star sticker goes to Brian P. for answering the question correctly.

so Brian T is in Houston now? at a church? that's news!

One thing is I have been trying to find some info and exactly how to configure XP from a system first install. What parameters to tweak and how to do it. Has anyone put this info in detail anywhere online?

SpappyOK OK Yes, I need to reinstall everything... I'll get to it OK!

Just interesting that I was still able to make Paris crash out when switching between projects, though the machine didn't hard crash and reboot like the previous machine.

Also, I attempted to burn a DVD with it and it rebooted, which was odd...

....maybe I'll reinstall and try again. ;o)

thanks nappy!Well, Lakewood is not just any church gig haha. The are the largest church in the US. This last Sunday they moved into their new building (Compaq Center where the Rockets used to play). 60,000 attended I believe. Their band is on staff full time with nice pay checks from what I gather. They release CDs and DVDs on a yearly basis so this is right up his alley I would imagine.

personal thanks to the people I was engaged in conversation with this was a lot better than some threads I've seen here in my time on this NG.

"And, now back to your regularly-scheduled audio rants!"

NeillIndeed, I second that.

For a bit there I was planning to move the threads over to General, but I ended up letting them stay as for the most part people were being respectful and actually exchanging info.

I'd still prefer these threads were kept in the general group. I think that's best all round, but of course sometimes discussions aren't planned and a thread just diverts off.

Generally though I think things were handled well, and though I agree with Don that it's pretty seldom if ever that someone's fundamental position changes in such a talk, I do believe that, with respectful informed discussion, that over time people will become better educated as well as better thinkers.

I think if we achieve those two things we're doing well, and I think overall these recent discussions were probably a step in that direction.

But anyhow, this is an audio group, so let's all forget the politics and focus on my NEW DAW BOX SHALL WE? ;o)

Cheers,
Kim.

>NeilOK, so I've been trying to finish up my 2nd CD, and there are a couple of songs that are in various stages of completion, but in the meanwhile I've been working on some mixes for the ones that are finished - you guys have heard some of this stuff, I posted links to a few tunes awhile back. Anyway I thought I'd try mastering this stuff myself - not because I think I can do a better job of it than a regular mastering engineer, but mainly just because I wanted to see if I could make it turn out the way I wanted it, and also be able to take the time to tweak as much as I liked - so to that end, some of you may recall that I picked up the Izotope Ozone app awhile back. Some observations on trying to master something that one has recorded oneself:

*You've got no objectivity - even if you leave the song alone & don't listen to it for awhile before attempting a mastering session, when you come back to it, you invariably are influenced by what you've already done in the mix. One one hand, this could be a good thing, because you more than anyone else know where you want to go with the song, but it's also a bad thing because in my case, I seem to want to enhance what I've got, rather than making any subtle changes that could present a different, perhaps better, picture.

*Expanded soundstages - There are a number of apps that can/will widen the stereo field... back in the late early 90's I did quite a number of mixes using the Bedini Audio Spatial Environment, and when I planned on using it I ALWAYS mixed with it inserted & "on". This was the only way I could mix & ensure that I knew what I was getting - boy, was it easy to "find the pocket" for just about any element in the mix using that box. Ozone has a stereo spread section, and it's very cool because it's multi-band, but the problem is, Ozone is pretty CPU-intensive, so if you've got a mix going with a good number of tracks & plugins running, you can't mix with Ozone inserted unless your 'puter is a raging fast one. When you use one of these stereo spread EFX in the mastering process, it affects the mix itself; it changes everything... your reverbs sound like you've boosted the level on them, you've got to watch your vocals, because they can drop, anything you have in stereo gets louder (and yes, I'm talking about even using it in very subtle settings!). Part of the objectivity problem is that since you mixed it, you probably perceive these changes as being more obvious than someone who didn't mix it...
