Hey guys, I'm wondering what you guys think of this product? Do you think there is a real market for this kind of guitar? Would you buy something like this? What do you think you would be willing to pay if the quality was good?

Thanks for your opinions in advance.

Unfortunately the weight and size will limit your market a lot. Plus twice as many strings to change. There is currently a digital modeling guitar out there that does Telecaster/Strat/Les Paul with a single knob. To me that is much more desirable.

I'm sure some guitarists will think it's great. I don't know how big that market might be.

I think double necked guitars are awkward and I doubt I'll ever get one.

I get a wide range of tones out of my PRS, with just one neck. Parker Fly, some Ibanez models and Carvins, even a fat strat can cover a lot of tonal ground without the extra weight and hassles of a double neck instrument.

I can get an even wider range of tones with my Variax, and instant alternate tunings. Roland has their VG line that works with any guitar with a hex pickup to provide that sort of thing as well. I like the Variax better than Rolands earlier models, overall, but I haven't heard Roland's latest VG99 which is still, I think, about to ship.

Cheers,
-Jamie

I would tend to agree. There's even one that will switch tunings for you wht the flip of a modeling switch (I think it's the Fender Strat version, IIRC). Yep, only reason to have a doubleneck onstage these days would be for the visual thang.

In the history of guitar retail, there has never been any thing close to the market of single neck guitars. Not gonna change IMO. Double's make great pictures and shoulder injuries and that's about it.

LOL! Maybe the money behind this new line is a group of chiropractors.

I don't know about the guitar, but the name sounds like something that might need to be treated with penicillin.

A friend of mine (and my former engineering mentor when I was just getting started with this stuff) works with him a lot. I sat in on a couple of JB sessions a while back.

Us guitar players are such slaves to tradition that things like this, even when brilliantly conceived and well executed, tend to fall on their butts. Most guys who find the need for both Tele and LP sounds revel in the coolness of having two or three or more guitars onstage and (if their really cool) a guitar tech to hand the right guitar, perfectly in tune) to them at the right moment. Guys like me (journeyman hacks) tend to favor one guitar with trick wiring that can emulate both sounds. More open-minded guys find the solution in the Roland and Line 6 modeling systems. I have a PRS (w/ trick wiring, but not so much for Tele sounds) and a very nice Tele clone and I have been known to take both to gigs. I'm getting too old to carry all that gear around (I also drag a tube amp and 2-12 cabinet around a lot of the time) but I don't play often these days and I just like playing my guitars!

Another problem w/ the 2 neck idea for me: The right and left hand geometry is pretty critical for me to play my best 9such as it is) and the 2 neck idea forces the player to choose between having one right and the other too high or low or compromising on and in between height. I wouldn't want to deal with that. It also looks to heavy for me...

James,

I just stopped hurling!

Seriously, some might find it interesting. Personally, I find that most of the songs that I play are suited to either a single coil, humbucker, or P90-style pickup. Consequently, I take a strat/tele, my PRS Soapbar II, and some type of humbucker-equipped axe (LP, SG, ES-335, etc.) with me to every gig.

My $.02!
