Listen closely to several different types of tunes and I'm sure you'll hear what I heard....a kacky smeary scratchy something or other somewhere in the 1.2k - 2k range

The salesmen (5 of them) thought I was until they heard it...we even switched out the demos for new speakers and sure enough it was on the new ones.

Obviously I didn't buy a pair

The Chinese built HR-824's are not the same as the older versions (we have the old ones here in two rooms)... if you can get some pre-asia versions they actually sound pretty good.

Have a look at the new JBL LSR4300's as well.

David.

My vote these are for the Dynaudio acoustics (BM5A or BM6A)s.
Very acurate sounding . You can hear "thru" your mixes.

Hey Rob

Noteperfect Alpha Pro...sight unseen...very scary buying something without hearing it first but Mike guranteed I wouldn't be disappointed...he was right!

I went hunting for two months and checked out damn near every decent brand in the 2-5K CDN range..ADAM. Dynaudio, Genelec, Quested, NHT, JBL, Westlake, B&W.....

To my ears the latest B&W 805's and up hit the mark so when I contacted Mike at Noteperfect he guaranteed that if his Alpha Pros didn't out perform the B&W 805's and everything else in that price range he'd refund my money less shipping. Add that to the fact I got a mismatched pair (finish-wise) for an excellent price and I couldn't go wrong. Mike even painted the veneered speaker black to match the other speaker at no charge.

The result...I am very happy and my mixes immediately began translating across systems much better than before. Great stereo imaging, tight bottom end, solid mids and smooth hi end...

They are worth at least double (if not triple) what he's selling them for when you compare them to what's on the market.

Ah, I'm old enough to remember when all we cared about was pre-CBS Fender.
Now it's pre-Asia Mackie! Careful, though, I'm also old enough to remember

Thanks for the heads up on Dyns LaMont, I had heard about em but never looked deeper. After a little googlin, I found that these have a really good rep online, some say they surpass HRs in many aspects. Gonna get some pricing on these. Its tough buying monitors out here, nobody stocks anything so "try before you buy" is not really an option.

Thanks

Gotta agree with both Lamont and Neil...nice monitors, especially the 6's....good value and good sound, just not my cup of tea but they were high on the list.

Let me get you the name of the distributor in Montreal...they have an excellent return policy for trying out different brands that they carry

I have the "USA" 824's " they are very good for the money, and they work well in a small space..I use them with a sub-woofer....Of course there are better speakers for way more money....You people were throwing out comparisons with Dynaudios..not fair....There are several "better" small nearfields these days if you have the cash...Genelecs,JBL,Tannoy,etc,etc... There is a substantial price difference.
The 5As are $999.00 Vs 6As $1699.00 CA.
Are the 5As plenty loud Neil?

Hey Rob

You might also consider a pair of Tannoy Reveal (reds) with a sub woofer (the 10" I think)

I have a friend who has freaking amazing ears and his mixes are truly spectacular...and that's what he's mixing on. I heard shit on those monitors that I'd never heard before. Then again he has an amazing front end. He can't really crank the puppies but that's not his style so if volume is a major criteria they might not be suitable.

Hi Rob..This is not true...Like all the Mackie monitor line, the Bass has a selective roll-off on theback to "tune" the bass...Like I said,I use mine with a subwoofer crossed over around 50 hz. I get very good mixes with them... Here again,you are talking about adding converters that cost MORE that the 824's . A pair of 824's are about $1,000. A pair of the Dynaudios are $2,000...what is the point of comparison here..? Are we comparing Hondas to Mercedes ?

IMO The HR824's are not flat enough to mix with. They boost the LF so you end up not putting enough low end in your mix.

If you can afford to look into some Dynaudio BM6A's Ive been mixing on them for a couple years, very accurate and clear.

If you want to go a step further get a D to A converter in front of them. Like a Mytek or a Benchmark and SPIDIF out of PARIS.

It will change your whole world at mix down.
Rock On!!!

Sounds like the Dynaudios are working great for you, Dominic.

One nice feature of the HR824s is that you can adjust low end response with a three-position switch on the back. And another for high freq response.

Plus there's another three-position switch to adjust for the position of the speakers in your studio relative to walls in order to compensate for low frequency buildup.

So if your HR824s are set up to sound too boomy in your space you can compensate. Did you have any luck with that?

Overall I've been pretty satisfied with the HR824 monitors for mixing. In my current space I have them set standard flat (middle position on the bass switch) and have them positioned away from walls. I use them near field. When I listen to reference music they have good definition and they don't sound like they are boosting LF. My mixes have held up well on other systems.

The HR824s are a much better reference than my other monitors which lacked good low end response.

Cheers,

-Jamie

Tonehouse is correct. I also own the HR824's and my mix's translate quite well...my room is a little "boomy" to boot! For me it rides on how well you know your gear/room/etc. Depending on who's in the conversation, the degree of variance can be quite significant in regards to what each person finds is workable/tolerable. I know some really talented engineers who categorically don't like Genelec's. I know others who won't mix on anything but...

I really like my HR824's and also find them to be a reasonably priced product.

OK, if we're talking bigger $s, you should check out PMCs. They are very, very true.

Bill

PS Guess what PMC stands for? Professional Monitor Company.
