I'm serious James. I grew up in south Texas, and spent a good part of my life on the Gulf coast. there were droughts and heat waves and hurricanes and all sorts of cyclical weather events. I'm well over the half century mark so I may have a little perspective on this due to my qualifying as somewhat of an old fart, and I've never seen sustained water temperatures this high in the gulf of Mexico. that may not cause hurricanes in and of itself, but it the warmer the water, the more likely a tropical storm is to turn into a real motherfucker on the half shell.
