Some of you may remember the home page from my beloved website (screenshot attached). A few months ago, under pressure, I rebuilt it as a standard self-promotion site.

page. I though I would write down a few music industry stories that I remember from years past.

The first one is about an early digital session I was evolved in. It was in 1978. If you have any interest in music industry history, you may find it interesting.

Bernie Kirsh, a friend, was one of the engineers on an advisory committee for the compact disk format and he told me that he and several others voted that 44.1 was not a high enough sample rate, but they went ahead with it anyway.

LOL. I should read what I write before I post. I have checked the Blog for my typical egregious typos, spellings, etc. But if you spot one, please let me know.

oddly enough, my old copy of firefox won't load the page.

my new copy of camino does, however.

I shall now commence reading...

Can we tell stories about studio sessions (and live gigs) involving lots of alcohol, drugs and debauchery?

Good stuff Gene!

You can tell if someone has been in this biz for a while by asking them if they have heard of Tom's Soundstream recorder. I met him at AES and saw it, but never used one.

Remember the groundbreaking Cleveland Symphonic Winds vinyl release? Digitally tracked, released on vinyl, sounded fab?

boy we're getting old...

Good reading, keep it up.

I think Bert contacted Tom and was turned down before he contacted Technics. I met Tom a few times years later. He belongs up there with the other great recording pioneers.

I met Fredrick Fennell in 1979 and did some work for Telarc using the 3M system in 80-81. The Cleveland Symphonic Winds caused quite a stir.

get to it.

Thanks

Hey Gene, I like your old site design AND your new one.

Used to have a Sony F1. Sold it to a guy who wanted it to beam digital audio via microwave. Clever use of (by then) old tech.

Cheers,

PS. Looks like I'll be doing a shoot in NY in about a week. If I'm anywhere near your place I'd love to pop in and say "hey!"

"Aaron Allen" <know-spam@not_here.dude> wrote:

>Heh.. you guys remember "drum drops" ?

ROFL!!! YES!!! The very first recording of my own material that I ever did was using Drum Drops! I didn't have a turntable at the time, so I asked a friend of mine to record the DD record onto a cassette or me, and there was one cut that worked well for a couple of songs I wanted to do, but it wasn't long enough so I recorded THAT cassette onto another cassette, stopped, cued-up the 2nd cassette (by playing back near the end & just hitting "stop") to my best guess at where a new entry point could be, backed up the first one, played into a few bars & started the 2nd cassette again in record (all this manually, of course). Took me a few tries, but then I had a slightly-over-four-minute drum track! lol

Would then play back the drum part into the 2nd cassette player, while laying down a guitar part, play THAT tape back while laying down a bass part, play THAT back while doing a vocal part, lead guitar, etc, etc. The drums had to be down to the 7th generation or so by the time I was done LOL

Scary thing is - I still have some of those tunes on a cassette somewhere, while I've lost or misplaced any number of other things I've done since then.

You bet. It had a major influence on the way I approached recording classical.

thanks again for the great stories and I look forward to reading more.

Good stuff Gene. Very enjoyable read. Looking forward to hearing more. As a relative newcomer to this, I'm fascinated by the ancient lore.
